

Dear fellow bookworm,

The last book I recommended was received quite well, and rather small. Sooo, I thought that while we were reading books by Jim Elliff I would throw out one more, "Wasted Faith." As we go through Romans on Sunday mornings many issues have and will arise, most importantly are the issues which provoke such questions as, What is the Gospel? What constitutes salvation? And, What is the nature of faith?

Here is an excerpt from the book,
"What is most alarming is the risky willingness of many professing Christians to gamble eternity on an emotional one-time experience, a 'sinner's prayer' properly prayed, or a feeling of substantial relief at a juncture in time, without ever taking a serious look at what is evident now, at this moment. Is eternal life of so little value that it seems unnecessary to examine ourselves for the evidence of it?"

So it seems that if you are a professing Christian, you are in one of three categories: 1. You may be a Christian and have biblical reasons to think so. 2. You may be a Christian yet struggle with troubling doubts. 3. You may think you are a Christian yet be deceived. Wasted Faith is a tool to help you determine just where you stand.

Sincerely,
Brother bookworm
